

ARCH5384 COMMUNITY DESIGN AND DEVELOPMENT RESOURCES

description...

This 3 hour graduate level course addresses the history, theory and practice of community design and development. It distinguishes community development from community design and addresses the roles of each as a function of city government and community life (quality of life, sense of place and 'place-making'). The course addresses the role and function of public and private organizations, as well as, local, state and federal government as it relates to the community design and development process.

The course is taught as an online distance course through WebCT providing students with a flexible course option. The student manages their time within intermediate deadlines provided by the instructor to promote course management. Grading is based on lecture quizzes, reading essays, journal entries and a semester professional report.
